Guillain-Barre Syndrome: Clinical presentation

Weakness

- Patients may be unable to stand or walk despite reasonable strength, especially when ophthalmoparesis or impaired proprioception is present.
- Weakness develops acutely and progresses over days to weeks.
- Severity may range from mild weakness to complete tetraplegia with ventilatory failure.

Occurrence varies by flu season. If this occurs, you may need a respirator to help you breathe. Complications can also include: lingering weakness, numbness, or other odd sensations even after recovery; heart or blood pressure problems; slow bowel or bladder function; blood clots and bedsores due to paralysis; blood clots and bedsores that result from being immobilized can be reduced. However, the CDC states that for every 1 million flu shots that are administered, 1 or 2 people tend to develop the condition. Around 30 percent of people affected by Guillain-Barre syndrome still experience some weakness after 3 years. The CDC and the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) have systems in place to: monitor the safety of vaccines; detect early symptoms of side effects; record any cases of Guillain-Barre syndrome that develop following a vaccination. According to the CDC, research indicates that you are more likely to develop Guillain-Barre syndrome from the flu itself rather than the flu vaccine. Electromyography (EMG) An electromyography (EMG) is a nerve function test. It asks you and your doctor to decide which treatment is best. Other treatments you may be given medication to relieve pain and prevent blood clots while you are immobile. You are likely to receive occupational and physical therapy too. This can include personal care activities, such as getting dressed. The weakness and paralysis that occurs with Guillain-Barre syndrome can affect multiple parts of your body. Complications may include difficulty breathing when the paralysis or weakness spreads to muscles that control breathing. This machine removes the antibodies from your blood and then returns the blood to your body. Intravenous immunoglobulin (IVIg) Immunoglobulin contains normal, healthy donor antibodies. The cerebrospinal fluid is then tested to detect protein levels. People with Guillain-Barre syndrome typically have higher-than-normal levels of protein in their cerebrospinal fluid.
