What is the best passport photo app uk

Anytime someone wants to get a passport, a single passport-size photo is required with the application. In the United States, the passport photo should be 2 by 2 inches in size. The photo should be taken on a white or neutral background, with the full head and top of shoulders visible. Since all potential passport holders need a photo, you can expect to get customers when you start your own passport photo ID Business. Write a business plan so you can brainstorm in terms of how you will market your business and make it successful. Business plans typically contain an executive summary, details on the business you want to start, financial data for the business and supporting documents. The U.S. Small Business Administration's website has a template for creating your business plan (see Resources). Use your savings, a credit card or a loan to purchase the equipment and supplies you need for the business, if you do not already have the items. If you must borrow money to start the business, you can use your business plan to show the lender what you will be doing and how you plan on being successful. Things you need include a camera and photo printer (such as the Sony UFX-C300 passport and ID system), a photo cutter, lighting and a neutral backdrop. Get a federal tax ID number, also called an employer identification number, from the Internal Revenue Service for your business. There is no charge. Apply for a license or permit in your local municipality. License and permit requirements vary by state and area. By visiting your local county courthouse and inquiring about license and permit requirements, you can learn if you need additional state permits and licenses. If required, you can apply for those through the secretary of state's office in your state. Prices vary for business permits and licenses. Secure a location for your business. If have space in your home, you can run the business out of a spare room or garage. Otherwise, your options are to buy or lease a space. If you are on a budget, you can look for businesses in the area that may be able to lease you a space. This can work because you will not need a lot of space for your equipment. When buying or leasing a commercial space, you typically need to have a large down payment. With leasing, you must also sign a contract to lease the space for a specific period. Price your services by visiting local passport-photo ID shops in your area to see what they are charging. You may not find any stand-alone shops offering this service. If so, check local photography and travel agency shops. Advertise your business in your area. Do this by placing ads in the local newspaper and any other local publications. If you are Web-savvy, you can create a website for your business. Otherwise, you can look for Web designers in your area to design the site for you. If there is a local college with a Web design program, you could ask a student to do the work for you. Today while trolling del.icio.us I found this great tutorial on how to make your own passport photo.This tutorial will show you how to take, format, and prepare your own passport photos. Rather than repeating what is already provided, please see the guidelines provided by the US Department of State. These will provide you with information regarding proper lighting, exposure, composition, and size. If you live in another country, please check for guidelines at your passport issuing authority as they will likely differ. For example, in Canada the final size can be as large as 70mm by 50mm, however, it appears as though they require a photo from a professional although that is not absolutely clear. Enough of this, let's get one with the process as it pertains to US requirements.You might be wondering why you'd do this? Well, if I remember right, when I got mine years back the wait for the photo was about 2 hours. Two long, boring hours.Making your own passport photos [dpchallenge] In a world where sophisticated Instagram filters enhance photographs and Snapchat filters can add on a full face of makeup, how does someone know when an image is doctored or when it's unaltered? It's tough, but one app is here to fight photo fraud by giving its stamp of authenticity for untouched content. Called Truepic, the startup behind it wants to use its patented photo verification technology to create "the world's first digital photo notary," reports TechCrunch. How to use TruepicUsers download the iOS or Android app and snap a picture or record a video. The app then checks if the content has been modified, and watermarks the untouched photo or video with a timestamp, geocode and other bits of metadata like photographer, device, and location where photo are captured. A copy is stored in the app's digital vault, secured with a six-digit code, and the watermarked image can be exported anywhere. Photoshop is an amazing tool for altering reality, but it's only really great when you're aware of Read moreWhat's the point?Being able to verify your photos and videos offers a handful of real world applications. Users can use this app to add credibility when listing items on consumer retail sites like eBay or Craigslist, or even when posting a space on a home rental site like Airbnb. Or the reverse: consumers can seek out the stamp when checking out listings to be a little more confident in the pics they're viewing. G/O Media may get a commissionThe stamp can also serve a noble purpose on dating apps, which are notorious for fake accounts and catfishing. Truepic's technology catches heavily modified images so a watermark means a photograph is genuine and not misleading. The timestamp offers validation that the photograph is a recent image of the individual. It won't get rid of all fraudulent photosWithout other apps embedding Truepic into their platforms, fraudsters can still, in theory, screenshot and re-use a Truepic-verified image they stumbled upon. There are others tools (like TinEye, Image Edited, FotoForensics, and ImgOps) that allow people to verify if an image has been modified or sourced from the internet. Users can also rely on something more simple and easy to access: a reverse Google image search. Clearly there are several resources available for a person looking to manually verifying images. But there are few, if any, third party methods for those trying to authenticate their own photos and videos. That's where Truepic's strength lies: it lets viewers know the content is real, undoctored and recent, and it allows those sharing content add a badge of authenticity to their photos and videos. In addition to the documents you need to submit, you'll also have to provide a photo. The U.S. Department of State has a list of requirements for the photo that must be met, or else you'll risk a delay in your application being processed. Fortunately, so long as you know what they are, meeting these requirements is not difficult — even if you want to take your own passport photo. There are even apps that will guide you through the process and let you take a qualifying photo with your phone. Daven Mathies/Digital Trends Taking your own passport photo has the advantage of being free (and gives you a tinge of pride), but paying someone else to do it can feel simpler. There are a number of places to have passport photos made, including select U.S. Post Office locations and many drugstores. If you're up for the challenge of doing it yourself, here's what you need to know. Official passport photo requirements A passport photo is not the time to submit your Hollywood headshot. In this case, the more natural you look in the photo, the more likely it will be accepted by the Department of State. The photo also needs to be taken recently, within the last six months. If you've undergone a significant change to your facial appearance — if you've grown a beard, for instance — you may also need a new passport with an updated photo. While the list of guidelines is long, they aren't really that complicated: Photo must be in color and taken within the last six months Do not use social media filters No selfies — have someone else take your photo, or use a tripod and a timer Background must be entirely white or off-white Remove glasses Head facing directly at the camera and in clear view Eyes should be wide open (infants' eyes can be closed or partially open) Remove red eyes and shadows (caused by a flash or overhead lighting) Keep a neutral facial expression or make a normal smile Wear clothing you would normally wear Unless it's for religious reasons, no hats or head coverings No objects should be in the photo, such as headphones or pacifiers Also, keep in mind that the State Department does not endorse any particular photo service, even those that claim to be government-compliant. The State Department could still reject a photo if it fails to meet the guidelines listed above. Use a mobile app There are plenty of passport apps available for both iOS and Android. One relatively new app that we found worked well is Passport Photo AID (iOS, Android). The app lets you shoot or add a photo from your camera roll, then analyzes it for compliance using artificial intelligence. Another nice feature is that it can automatically remove the background and replace it with pure white, which is great if you don't have white walls in your home. While you can use the app for the free, taking advantage of the automatic background removal does incur a small fee, but also promises to have a human review your photo for accuracy. You can also pay a bit more for premium service, which will print and deliver your photos to you within 72 hours, according to the app. In addition to passports, the app can assist with a number of different official documents. If you'd rather just upload a photo from your computer, you can still take advantage of Passport Photo AID's A.I. compliance checks and other features through the company's website. If you prefer to have your passport photo mailed to you, another popular app is Passport Photo Booth (iOS, Android). A set of two photos — printed on one 4-inch by 6-inch sheet of photo paper — can be had for $6, and it's mailed to you within seven to nine days. The app also lets you email the photo (as two 2-inch by 2-inch photos on a 4-inch by 6-inch canvas; six 2-inch by 2-inch photos that cover the entire 4-inch by 6-inch canvas; or a single 2-inch by 2-inch photo), or save it to a camera roll. You can also use the square photos in your social media profile, and both the latter options allow you to print at home or send to a pharmacy via an app like Walgreens or CVS. Another highly rated app to consider is Passport Renewal and Photo (iOS, Android) from ItsEasy.com. Like the aforementioned options, the cross-platform app guides you in taking a proper passport photo. In addition to having the photo sent to you for a small fee, you can also apply it to a passport application, which ItsEasy.com can facilitate. Shoot and print at home Do you have a digital camera, inkjet printer, and photo paper? Then you can take a professional passport picture just like a photography studio. Have someone take the photo for you, or set your camera on a tripod and use a timer or remote (most modern digital cameras have Wi-Fi and companion apps that will even let you preview the photo and trigger the camera from your phone). For positioning, the camera should be at least 4 feet away, perhaps farther, depending on the lens (avoid using a wide-angle lens for a more flattering portrait). Make sure that the photo is properly exposed (not too bright or too dark) and that the subject is facing directly ahead, with their eyes open. If there's a shadow, you will need to adjust the lighting (usually caused by overhead lighting) and retake the photo. Keep in mind, even if you're an advanced photographer, this is not the time to get fancy with your lighting setup. Use a flat, even light that shows your entire face clearly. If you can position yourself with an open window in front of you, that's probably all the light you'll need. The background must be white or off-white, without any distracting patterns or textures. A smooth white wall is perfect. A white sheet, if suspended evenly without any wrinkles, can also work. We would avoid going out and buying an actual photo backdrop, as this will cost more than simply having your photos done at Walgreens. Be sure to leave spacing at the top and sides of the image (you can crop it to the right dimensions later). The printed photo will need to be 2 x 2 inches, and your head needs to be between 1 and 1 3/8 inches tall. The State Department provides its own tool on its website for cropping your image, but note this is an older tool that requires Adobe Flash Player. To print your passport photos, use a color inkjet printer. It's best to use one that supports photo paper. A portable photo printer like Epson's PictureMate PM400 is handy for a task such as this. It even comes with a built-in passport photo template that helps make the process go a little faster. With that in mind, note that 2-inch by 2-inch photo paper does not exist (the passport photo requirement size). Government guidelines require you to print your image on 4-inch by 6-inch paper (or larger) and cut the portrait out yourself. You can expect to always get a pair of printed passport photos from expert photographers, but it's unnecessary to have two for yourself. Usually, the only time you would need another picture is if you happen to make a mistake when filling out your application. Of course, it can be beneficial to have a spare print on hand, especially if you aren't confident with a pair of scissors. Our pick We're leaning towards a mobile app that conveniently transfers passport photos directly to your home. Although it comes with a higher price and you can't choose your preferred print service, it's still quite elementary. Instead of going through numerous print sessions and breaking out your safety scissors, you can relax and let the pros handle the details. We're also big fans of compliance checks, which are a more reliable option than doing it on your own. That being said, if you're a photographer or are especially picky about your photo, taking and printing your own passport photos is still an available option for you. Keep in mind that this is pretty much the only way to guarantee that you get a flawless shot. Similar to driver's licenses, passport photos are known to be unflattering, so this may be the route to take if you find yourself concerned about your image. If you choose this option, we advise having the proper equipment ready to go. If you're prepared, you'll be able to capture the most attractive passport pic of all time. Editors' Recommendations
