The basic design of the loft at Lamberton Racing Pombons reflects the life cycle of racing pigeons. At the beginning, the young pāsaros are shocked in the breeding loft - weaned and ran in the young pĀssaro - moved to the old loft floor - and retired to the breeding loft if they performed well enough to win a nest box. In Lamberton Racing pigeons, this process is called the "life cycle rotation of racing pigeons" during which racing pigeons start their lives and end their lives in the same section reproduction. All pigeons - breeders, young birds or ancient birds - are released from their sections and re-insert their loft sections through a common room or "foyer". Consequently, all racing pigeons use the same entrance and get out for all their entry and get out lives. As the loft is predicated on the rotation of the life cycle of racing pigeons, the pigeon loft actually three lofts or wings combined into a large loft in the shape of a cross. The top of the cross (which is actually in the bottom of the diagram) used for (1) the landing area, (2) the entrance area or "trap" (as said in America) or Sputnik (as referred to in Europe), and (3) release area. A wings house young pāsaros. A wings house old pareos. And the wings in front of the landing plate, the retired pilots who become full-time breeders. (The location of pigeons on the inner wings arbitrary.) The "A" & "B" wings of the loft are built in sections. The exact length of the wings should depend on the number of sections that you want to build on each wing; and it depends on the number of racing pigeons you want to race. See the second digital image of the loft design below. Our loft sections have a fine sliding door built between them so we can walk from the section of the loft. Wings can also be built nine or ten pĀs wide (instead of six s width) to add a corridor Three or four buns s down the wing length and in front of the loft The runners will allow the creators to walk in each loft section without going through another section. However, if a corridor is built below the length of each wings, every endentry must be made to ensure that the loft's wings fan properly. As a general rule, wider and deeper the section of wings and / or loft - the poorest the ventilation. Based on our experience in Belgium, our lofts are built like a . Lofts that are built only six or two meters tend to "breathe" or ventilate much better and much more naturally than wider lofts in which the natural movement of air is much more stagnant due to the width of the wing. The natural ventilation of each wings and/or loft section should result in a delicate and contemporary exchange of air. Consequently, our loft sections are built five wide and six deeply deeply - like chimneys. In addition ventilation, however, another important reason for the construction of small loft sections that small sections dramatically increase their ability to control, manage and train racing pigeons within sections. Once again, we learn in Belgium that loft sections should not be built much larger than the area within your arms when you are the middle of a loft section with the arms extended and rotate 360 degrees. The height of the ceiling in the section of the loft should not be more than six inches above its height. Which is why? Because the pigeons in each loft section should not be able to fly, besides you when you are anywhere in the loft section. You should be able to physically master and control the movement and behavior of running birds in each section with your hands, arms and body. When you enter your loft sections, running birds should remain quietly in their nest boxes, rather than quickly flying to another loft section or to the floor or to an open plane. It's usually much more pigeons a racing system if they are constantly flying and walking away. Attentive, stationary pigeons tend to make better students of the racing pigeon game. We built nest boxes along the back walls of loft sections. For five buns s by six bread s by six bread . Yeah. We built six nest boxes two boxes through. Three boxes down. Every nest box constructed at about thirty centimeters wide and twenty-four inches deep. (These dimensions fit the plastic-coated nest fronts based on what is used to build our nest boxes. The nest fronts that are sized or constructed differently from our nest fronts can change the exact size of the nest boxes). Example: If you want to run twelve young pigeons, one wing of the loft must be built in three sections: two sections to accommodate the twelve racing birds (six pigeons per section) and one section to house the companions of the twelve-race birds (this section should contain twelve poles built small enough to discourage the teammates from docking). reproduction should be built large enough to accommodate a reasonable number of creators. In general, the lofts should face the east or south to capture the nearest solar light of a geographical area and to avoid the afternoon heat of a sun environment in the West. Lofts should rarely face the north, permit Important: Pigeon lofts must be designed for the ease and comfort of both race pigeons and racing fans of pigeons. Comfortable shops tend to invite and encourage creators to spend more time in the loft. inefficient people tend to discourage FANCI from spending too much time in the loft. the top of the running sheet always involves a significant amount of spent in the loft building relationships with each racehorse pigeon and teaching the race teams a racing system. system. system.
