HowStuffWorks Newsletter Correct answer: Correct answer: Correct answer: Correct answer: I've always been interested in the flow of information. In high school and university, I studied journalism, which in turn introduced me to advertising. I quickly moved to the media side of the advertising market as I loved studying media models, demographics, sociographics and trends. Trends seem to come faster and faster these days, as evidenced by the growth of the website, followed by blogs, followed by social networks and now by social news. Twitter is a great example of social news, where people receive raw data and distribute it instead of being filtered by reporters and writing it for them. Thomas Baekdal recently published a long overview of the history of information with a fairly well-educated guess as to where the flow is going. As you can see from the chart below or by looking at the original article in the link above, it traces the history of information from "beyond the fence" and the local market to newspapers/magazines, radio, television, web, blogs (already outdated?) to the new and imminent domain of social media. While the past is a fact, the future is obviously harder to predict. Yet his observations make sense with social media as the dominant force in the next decade. It's a useful reading. Find out how past events have influenced and shaped our world. These resources and guides will guide you through the facts, interpretations and lessons of history, from the earliest civilizations to the present day. Teachers will find useful resources to teach history in class.
