Starhub tv guide channel 824

By Marshal M. Rosenthal Digital television has the advantage over analog in that it receives all of the broadcasts being transmitted with full signal strength and none of the interference inherent in the now outdated system. You can build your own digital antenna that will receive over-the-air broadcasts without needing to have extensive electronic or mechanical skills. A few hardware items and tools are all that is needed and about an hour of your time. Your digital TV antenna will work with your existing cable box or satellite receiver or even directly in your high-definition TV. Put newspaper down on a table. Put the empty coffee can on its side down on the newspaper, with the open end facing to the left. Measure 9 inches up from the closed end of the empty coffee can. Hammer the nail through the side of the empty coffee can at the 9-inch mark. Stop hammering when the nail is three-quarters through the side of the empty coffee can. Cut off the connector from one end of the coaxial cable using the wire cutters. Strip off an inch of insulation from the center core of the coaxial cable with the wire cutters. Wind the exposed center core of the coaxial cable around the nail on the outside of the side of the empty coffee can. Hammer the nail the rest of the way into the side of the empty coffee can. Put a piece of duct tape over the nail on the outside of the empty coffee can. Smooth the duct tape down onto the side of the empty coffee can. Place the empty coffee can that is now a digital TV antenna outside, for example, on a window in your backyard or on a tree branch. Snake the coaxial cable that is attached to your digital TV antenna into your house. Attach the connector on the end of the coaxial cable into the coaxial connection on your satellite or cable receiver or into the coaxial connection on your high-definition TV. We've been waiting for the fourth-generation Apple TV for at least two years now, and we've been teased with vague comments, leaks from the supply chain, and analyst predictions for several years running. We thought we'd get a look at it this year at the Worldwide Developers Conference, but Apple was still not ready to show it off. Until we get a whole new model with, hopefully, a brand new look to the operating system, we have to stick with what we've got. The number of media channels is not getting any smaller, with Apple adding new content on a regular basis. For example, Apple recently added NatGeo TV. Content options are great, but sifting through dozens of channels can be a pain sometimes. If you're tired of scrolling through the nearly seven dozen channels looking for the ones you use most, you can hide everything you don't want to access, making it much easier to get to the content you want. We've got a quick tutorial to show you how. Customizing Channels on the Main Menu On Apple TV, go to your Settings app, which is always in the second row below your iTunes and shared computer channels. Select Main Menu from the list. Select "Hide" for every channel that you don't want showing by selecting the channel and clicking the center select button on the Apple TV remote. Channels that will be visible on the Apple TV are listed as "Show," while channels that will no longer show up are listed as "Hide." New channels will appear on the Main Menu whenever they are added to Apple TV. If you don't want to see them, follow the steps above for the new channel. You can also go back and add channels to Main Menu whenever you like by clicking on it until it has "Show" next to it instead. Troubleshooting If your Apple TV is running slowly, shuts off randomly, or is otherwise working poorly, one way to fix it is to restart it. Unplug the connection to your television set. Unplug the power cable from the box. Plug the TV cable back in. Plug the power cable back in. Wait for Apple TV to finish reloading. There may be deeper issues with your set-top box that a simple restart can't fix. If so, you may need to reset it to factory settings. On Apple TV, go to the Settings app. Select General. Scroll down to select Reset. Select Restore. This will restore Apple TV to its factory settings, removing all passwords you have entered for all of your channels. The restoration will take a while. Don't unplug your Apple TV during the process. If you can't restore Apple TV to its factory settings from the Main Menu (like, if your box is frozen and just stops working altogether), you can perform the process via iTunes by connecting your Apple TV to your computer. You will need a micro-USB cable and the latest version of iTunes running on your Internet-connected computer for this process. Disconnect the power and television cables from Apple TV. Open iTunes on your computer. Then connect Apple TV to your computer using the micro-USB cable. If you have the third-generation Apple TV, you will also need to plug the box into a power source. Once connected, Go to the Apple TV summary page in iTunes and select "Restore Apple TV." When the restoration process is finished, disconnect Apple TV from your computer and reconnect it to your television set. Hopefully, we won't be waiting around for too much longer before Apple finally presents us with the next big thing for television. But, until then, at least we can organize our channels the way we want to.
