Youngs nga has been working in a company for a few years now, and one day you get an e-mail announcing that your dream job inside the company is opening. You see they're accepting internal applications, so you send your pen. Now, you can think, all you have to do is wait to hear if you have, because they know you, right? Wrong. Normally, companies will still want to interview you for a new position, even though you've been working there for years. In this article, I'll share with you some tips and tricks to help you make a good impression. Use your position for your advantage. If the company is also accepting external applications, you have some privileged information for your interview. You saw the company and the department in action, and you might even know the person who's interviewing you. Use these knowledge to highlight the particular skills and qualifications you know value for this job. You can also work to show how your internal knowledge would benefit you if you got the job. This is a unique quality to have, so make sure you point out all the positive aspects of having this perspective. Be professional. Even if you know that the interview will be casual, you should make the same effort you normally would make to prepare for the meeting. Dress up to impress, even if this means that your costume is a little more formal than what you would normally use to work with. Don't overdo it, but the extra effort will show you're taking this seriously. If you know the interviewer, be friendly, but still keep him professional. Answer the questions as deeply as you would for someone you never knew. Be prepared with examples. Some of the most common interview questions that exist are behavioral questions. This means that interviewers will ask questions about their past behavior in order to predict their future performance in this new role. Before the interview, consider some recent and noteworthy contributions that have been made to you and that will help you stand out. While it is great to consider your achievements, the preparation of the internal interview also involves a hard look at your past mistakes and growing areas. Although these questions can be stressful, it is easier to answer when you have an idea of what you mean. Finally, practice the STAR method (situation, task, action, result). It is a clean way to organize your stories in brief but coherent narratives that your interviewer will be able to easily understand. Although it is impossible to find answers for each question/behavioral, give your best to make a brainstorming of examples of your various competencies and and to be used to achieve successful results. Do your homework. Practice your answers, come up with a list of ready-to-ask questions in return, and come and find out exactly what you're requesting. Research the position and department to show that you are aware of what you are getting into and that you are taking it seriously. You want to perfect your company's mission, vision and values. Accompaniment. As you would after an external interview, send a thank you card or email to your interviewer, ideally on the same day of your meeting. If and when you see your interviewer in the office, be friendly, but don't put them on the wire over position or try to make an impression too good. Just wait patiently, as you would for any other job. Once the date has passed when they said they would return to you, politely follow the status of your application. If you have not been given a date, wait about a week or two to do so. This additional effort will further demonstrate your desire for the role, which can simply push you to the top of the candidate list and result in a job offer. Never miss an opportunity that's good for you.
