Famed for their dogged indifference, cats just want to be understood and not terrified by your seemingly innocent human behavior. These tips can help ensure a happier, and thus healthier, kitty. At TreeHugger we have a soft spot for natural remedies to help pets, but sometimes the best medicine is simple prevention. And as it turns out – according to the experts – an environment that a cat finds stressful can lead to a number of chronic cat diseases. Despite thinking that we really know our cats, Tony Buffington from Ohio State University says that few of us understand how to listen to our cats, notes Wired magazine. This leads to frustrated humans who can’t fathom, for the life of them, why kitty keeps scratching the sofa or attacking the hand that strokes. And it leads to a stressed cat, which can lead to poor health and disease.

The best cure, he says, is “learning to listen to your cat, giving him choices, and reducing the environmental factors that trigger his stress response.”
“No matter how much we love them, cats are our captives, domesticated aliens with no way of explaining their customs, or of interpreting ours,” writes Nick Stockton. Unlike dogs and (most) humans, cats are not innately social. They evolved as solitary hunters and are not adept at reading our social cues. You may yell, snap, clap, make gestures and noises at a cat who is not minding you. A dog gets it, a cat thinks: “BIG AGGRESSIVE PRIMATE ACTING CRAZY, BE WARY!” Without the cognitive ability to make the connection between your anger and their behavior, cats just see aggression. This is frightening for the cat, frustrating for both cat and human, and ultimately leads to stress for the cat because of the constant disruption to natural feline behaviors.
“Cats get sick when they want to express their natural behaviors and they can’t,” Buffington says. And they will continue to sneak in their feline activities while you’re not around. It’s just their nature. Buffington offers these tricks for working with your cat; rather than an unintended fear campaign, these smart approaches take your cat’s view into consideration.

Create mechanical obstacles, rather than emotional ones. Put two-sided tape on furniture-scratching areas, line the kitchen counter with tinfoil – and put a more-attractive alternative nearby, like a scratching post or cat-tree for perching. When kitty chooses the alternative, reward him or her. Food bowl by the fridge? Litter box in the laundry room? While these seem perfectly fine for us giant animals, Buffington says that household appliances sound like monsters to the cat who’s trying to eat and poop in silence. Make sure the food bowl and litter box are in calm areas where there is an exit route if kitty feels threatened. Cats are interested in other animals, but don’t want to feel exposed. They don’t understand glass and don’t understand that a window offers protection, says Boffington. Provide hidden observation places, and importantly, make sure there is someplace high – like a shelf or cat tree – where your kitty can observe in peace.
Must, Pet, Soft, Fluffy. Cat. It’s almost impossible to resist, as if we are hard-wired to reach out feel the warm silky fur on our fingers. But cats are not naturally as affectionate as we are, says Boffington, and we should let them initiate and lead the cuddling. If your cat rubs against you, she is saying it’s ok for you to pet that part of her. Barry Keleher/Flickr/CC BY 2.0
Likewise, most cat owners know this one. Kitty flips on their back and displays the splayed belly, you go in for the stroke and WHAP, four sets of claws and a mouthful of teeth come in for the kill. Boffington says that this is because a cat’s tummy is the most vulnerable part; exposing it to you means they are displaying trust, not requesting some lovey-dovey wrangling. A cat’s raised tush is not an invitation to give the base of the tail area a good hard rubbing. The rump of a cat is chock full of nerves and is very sensitive. Some petting there will probably be tolerated, but overstimulating the area is like being uncomfortably tickled. Dogs love to have dog buddies, cats, not so much, says Boffington. Or course some cats will have their best friends, but cats do not need to be around more cats, he says; in nature, wild cats are solo hunters and other cats indicate competition, not friendship. If you need to introduce new cats to each other, it’s good to do so gently. You can rub each cat with a dry towel and then rub the same towel on the other cat so that they can become accustomed to the other’s scent. Make sure each cat has eaten and had plenty of affection so that they are comfortable, and introduce them while making sure both are receiving human attention. Allow them to mingle without forcing it, and make sure there is an escape route in case one of them gets freaked out and needs to hit the road. As aloof as they may be, Boffington says that cats really do want to connect with their human – and great bonds are often made. If Kitty seems upset when you leave for the day, try to create a ritual for when you leave and return. When you’re ready to depart, call your cat, talk to him or her and give some affection; let him know you are saying good-bye. And create a similar re-entry ritual. While some of this may seem like common sense and many of you may have cats who defy these descriptions and behaviors altogether, it’s really a wonderful exercise to step out of our human skin and get a cat’s eye view of things. You’ve got nothing to lose and everything to gain, especially if you can help your cats be the happy and healthy creatures that they deserve to be. While there are definite differences between the look of dogs and cats, each carry similar body designs. From the need to carry themselves using four legs to the tail that each is born with, their body design helps them carry out their natural instincts for surviving in the world. Some dog and cat breeds have been modified through breeding practices humans have implemented throughout the years. However, each of these species of animals was originally intended to have certain physical characteristics to protect them from things such as their environment and predators. For example, most breeds of both dogs and cats have fur to cover them and keep their skin safe from hot and cold weather in which they live. Cats and dogs have claws designed into their paws to give them tools for hunting and fighting off predators. However, some breeds are now found without these natural features due to artificial genetic engineering. Survival Instincts It is the basic instinct for all living things to seek out food when they are hungry. This is no different between dogs and cats. When necessary, these different species of animals will hunt for their food if needed. Most domesticated animals will find ways of communicating their time of hunger with their owners. However, if left in the wild or on their own, these animals will find the prey necessary to feed on. Both dogs and cats are carnivorous animals. This means that they need meat for iron, protein, and nutritional supplements to survive. They will consume smaller animals or fish to fulfill their dietary needs. Territorialism Dogs and cats will protect their territory. For domesticated animals, this is often their home and the people they see within their pack. While cats tend to be more isolated with their territory, dogs tend to gravitate to other dogs to form a full pack. Each of these animals understands who their predators are, allowing them to defend their territories as needed. Need for Affection While each animal has its own way of showing their need for affection, both dogs and cats have a natural need for receiving this type of attention. Cats tend to burrow into their owners or other animals while dogs tend to be more vocal about their need for affection. Both species of animals need praise. For dogs, this may be found in simple acts, such as doing something on command. One common way in which cats seek praise is through their hunting instincts. For example, it is not uncommon for a cat to hunt a mouse or other type of rodent. Even if they are not hungry, the cat will drop the dead rodent at the feet of their human companion, seeking out praise for their services. Body Language Dogs and cats have a certain body language that they display. When content, the animal can often be found curled up in a resting position. However, if the animal feels threatened, you will see characteristics such as a tenseness between their shoulders, tucked tails, and tufts of fur sticking up along their back.
