Typically, this approach focuses attention on what a given product has to offer in terms of quality and practical use rather than comparing the product to similar goods or services available in the marketplace. Advertising of this type is often used with newer products, making it easier for potential customers to quickly and easily learn what the product is, what it does, and why it would be worth the time and effort to give the product a try. Tobacco companies are one of the more notable examples of this. After many years in the teleconferencing industry, Michael decided to embrace his passion for trivia, research, and writing by becoming a full-time freelance writer. Since then, he has contributed articles to a variety of print and online publications, including SmartCapitalMind, and his work has also appeared in poetry collections, devotional anthologies, and several newspapers. Also, informative ads tend to help generate a good reputation. Many different types of organizations use informative advertising. Some unions and trade organizations have run informative advertisements to promote public awareness of what they see as the value of their organization. Another advantage to informative advertising is that the approach tends to provide examples of when and how to safely make use of a product. Alcohol producers have been running advertisements with the general message being don't drive drunk. In some circumstances a business might be required to run informative advertising as part of resolving a lawsuit. After many years in the teleconferencing industry, Michael decided to embrace his passion for trivia, research, and writing by becoming a full-time freelance writer. Non-profit organizations often use this strategy to educate the public about a disease, charity, or other endeavor that is the reason for the organization's existence, inviting others to participate in support of that endeavor. One has to do with the building of a solid reputation among consumers. California State Highway Patrol ran a "click-it or ticket" campaign explaining the risks involved in not using a seat belt. The idea is to give the ad the look of an official article to give it more credibility. Businesses use the approach to educate consumers on the goods and services they have to offer. This strategy is often perceived as indicating a greater degree of confidence in both the product and the ability of the consumer to manage the comparison process and make the right decision. In like manner, companies who produce alcoholic products will typically inform readers that driving after enjoying the products is discouraged. Since the approach includes an effort to educate consumers on the nature and benefits of the product, there is little to no room to draw comparisons with similar products or infer that those other products are not as good. Malcolm's other interests include collecting vinyl records, minor league baseball, and cycling. Instead, the informative approach makes no comparisons, but simply provides factual data about what the product does and does not offer. For example, pharmaceutical companies will include information in print and other types of media ads that make consumers aware that it is not recommended to take a certain product while pregnant, driving a car, or operating heavy machinery. Governments agencies use this form of advertising. There are several benefits associated with the use of informative advertising. Along with equipping consumers with knowledge on what they may and may not do after using a product, this approach also helps to minimize the potential for lawsuits that would otherwise develop if those types of warnings were not included in the advertising effort. Even religious and philosophical organizations utilize informative advertising to educate the public on core beliefs and values, as well as the scope of programs and ministries offered by those organizations, an approach that makes it easier to connect with like-minded individuals and allow the organizations to grow.
